SUMMARY

Radio discussion of Party affairs, following the change occasioned by the recent Communist Party Congress, has been resumed along familiar lines, and the usual strictures about shortcomings are now backed with appropriate quotations from Malenkov's and other Congress speeches. There is continued emphasis on the necessity of accepting the primary Party organizations as an integral part of the Communist pyramid. Official concern about "weakening the contact with the masses" (oslablenie svyazi s massami) through the persistent disregard of primary organizations is stressed in extensive comment on the subject. Evidence that political education in the Party school network is not always productive of the desired results is contained in the frequent references to the incompetent educators -- political instructors and agitators -- turned out by the mentioned schools. Communist indoctrination, it is reiterated, must be hammered into the people's minds relentlessly until it is fully assimilated. Mismanagement of personnel affairs and nepotism also claim some attention.

There is very little discussion of ideological themes. Malenkov's speech to the 19th Congress is quoted extensively with reference to surviving anti-Soviet and "unstable elements" (neustoichivie elementy) within the Soviet Union, and to "pernicious" (vrednaya) propaganda influences from abroad. Some resistance to the Michurin and other prescribed lines of scientific inquiry is seen in the vague allusion to the "monopoly" (monopolia) of certain groups of scientists which has "not yet been liquidated."
